Foundation support nears new peak

The University of North Dakota Foundation has recorded $1,838,531 in gift support during the first six months of the 1987-88 fiscal year.

Compared to the same period in 1986-87, this amount reflects an increase of 36 percent, or almost $500,000 more in gifts. The $1.8 million already raised equals approximately 62 percent of last year's total gifts of almost $3,000,000.

"This stands as one of the most successful end of tax year giving seasons ever for the UND Foundation," said Gerald Van Eeckhout, '62, president of the Foundation.

"There are a number of gifts in the process of being finalized which could well bring total support and revenue during this fiscal year to its highest peak ever," Van Eeckhout said. The previous high year was in 1979-80 when the Foundation recorded the historic multi-million dollar land gift of the late Ken Hyslop. Total support and revenue that year was $7.2 million.

Pace may pass record of 1979-80

The Foundation's assets have grown since 1980 from $8.5 million to $26.2 million for the year ending June 30, 1987. Van Eeckhout reports a minimal impact on total Foundation assets from the current stock market decline with total assets, as of

Dec. 31, 1987, recorded at $24.9 million. An additional $11.7 million has been pledged in direct gifts or testamentary provisions which are not included in the total asset figure.

The UND Foundation Annual Sustaining Drive Chairman, Frank Bavendick, president of the UND Alumni Association, reports an increase of $58,000 as of Dec. 31 recorded over the same period last year. Total annual sustaining drive contributions come to $493,878 — 54 percent of the $912,485 raised last fiscal year. "We are very optimistic of reaching our

$1,000,000 annual sustaining drive goal," Bavendick said. "We are pleased with the increased contributions each year, and we expect to close out the drive almost $250,000 over the amount raised two years ago."

The number of donors also has increased according to Bavendick. As of Dec. 31, the Foundation has recorded 3,584 contributors, up 89 from a year ago. The drive is right on track for the first six months, with more than 50 percent of the 1987-88 goal of 7,000 contributors already attained. Last year's drive closed at 6,422 contributors.

"We are seeing an increasing number of corporate matching gifts," Bavendick said. "So far this year we have raised almost $65,000 from this extremely valuable program. This is an excellent way for our alumni and friends to double or even triple the beneficial impact of their personal support."

The impressive figures reported by the UND Foundation for the first half of the 1987-88 fiscal year have proven that the effects of the 1986 tax law changes on charitable giving have been minimal. Many individuals feared there would be a decrease in charitable giving as a result of some of the tax law (see ENDOWMENTS, page 3)

ALUMNI REVIEW

Lux $100,000 endowment funds scholarships, engineering needs

Retired U.S. Army Col. H.G. "Bud" Lux, '32, and his wife, Muzette, '30, rarely have missed an opportunity to express their fondness for the University of North Dakota.

These 1930s graduates and worldwide travelers have attended numerous Homecomings. They were active in the UND alumni chapter in Washington, D.C. They found time to assist in fund raising, serving as class chairmen for the Annual Sustaining Drive, and as volunteers for the historic UND Centennial Campaign.

Now Bud and Muzette have made yet another contribution to UND. They have entered into a charitable remainder annuity trust arrangement of more than $100,000 with the UND Foundation, which will eventually fund an endowment in their name. They also have informed the Foundation of testamentary provisions in their wills which will provide additional funds for the endowment.

The endowment will support scholarships for students who are members of the Alpha Phi sorority and the Beta Theta Pi fraternity, and fund priority needs within the School of Engineering and Mines.

Bud Lux was raised in Great Falls, Mont. A high school all-state football quarterback, he was recruited by UND Athletic Director Paul J. Davis. While attending UND, Lux joined the Reserve Officers Training Corps and the Beta Theta Pi fraternity. It was at UND that he met his lifelong partner, Muzette Willis, a native of Grand Forks who was a UND student and a member of the Alpha Phi sorority.

Muzette graduated with a degree in education in 1930, and taught high school in Langdon, N.D., while Bud finished his studies. A distinguished ROTC graduate cadet, Bud earned a degree in commerce in 1932. He joined the Army Reserves after graduation, and married Muzette in 1933.

Serving on active duty from May 1942 to October 1946, Bud was integrated into the regular Army Corps of Engineers in 1947, retiring as a colonel in 1963. Bud has worked as an engineer in many places, including Spain; Trinidad; British West Indies; Puerto Rico; Virgin Islands; Thule, Greenland; Morocco; Turkey; Saudi Arabia; Labrador; Newfoundland; Baffin Island; Azores; Bermuda; Germany; Eniwetok, Marshall Islands; Japan, and throughout the United States, including the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, N.Y.

In 1968, Bud received the Alumni Association's highest honor, the Sioux Award, for his career and service accomplishments. The Luxes have two children, Carl, living in Alexandria, Va., and Susan Spencer, living Cocoa, Fla.

The Luxes are members of the UND Foundation Benefactors Club, an honor bestowed on individuals who have made outright gifts or provisions for deferred gifts of $100,000 or more.

Muzette, '30, and Bud Lux, '32

"Their generosity in making provisions to establish the H.G. "Bud" and Muzette Lux Endowment is greatly appreciated," said Earl Strinden, executive vice president of the UND Alumni Association and Foundation. "It reflects once again their outstanding dedication to their alma mater. Their uncommon loyalty to the University of North Dakota will never be forgotten."

Bud and Muzette are quick to point out, "If it wasn't for UND, we would never have met."

VP Donn Osmon He leads the parade on UND-to-3M route

By DAVE VORLAND

Donn R. Osmon is vice president of marketing and public affairs for 3M, the Minnesota-based company that last year sold $9.4 billion in products created from nearly a hundred scientific technologies.

And although his job is near the top of the organizational chart, Osmon, '55, shares one characteristic with 179 other 3M employees: all are alumni of the University of North Dakota.

3M always has appealed to job seekers with UND degrees, and the company has hired large numbers of them, Osmon said during a recent interview in his St. Paul office.

In fact, the University of North Dakota ranks seventh on the list of schools that have supplied 3M's college-trained employees.

His company has been attractive to top UND graduates, Osmon suspects, because of the famous 3M operating style.

3M has long been characterized by a management philosophy that minimizes barriers (see VP Osmon, page 12)

At work or play, UND students grade over 'OK'

UND Has A High Quality Student Body

On occasion, we receive a letter or two criticizing some publicized incident on the UND campus. I suspect such criticism is as old as the University itself. I remember some years ago when certain legislators were "up in arms" because a particular national radical was the students, but rather because it was a waste of student funds.

More recently, the UND Student Senate decided to sponsor a week-long informational program on AIDS prevention. This, of course, was prompted by the national news about AIDS and the fear of this dreaded disease becoming a national epidemic. As expected, the happening made for good local and area news headlines, and we received a few letters from alumni expressing concern. Again, we had a situation where the publicity outweighed the significance given to this by the majority of UND students.

The fact is that the student body at UND is very representative of the individual student's home and family values. Having had the pleasure of observing students for 20 years and having been a student myself three decades ago, I give the students of today a high grade for their work ethic, lifestyle and commitment to receiving a good education and preparing for careers of service and achievement.

I have been impressed by the student involvement in community service. Frequently, as I drive down University Avenue, I see various fund raising activities under way in front of the fraternities and sororities for the benefit of any number of worthy projects. UND still has active chapters for Blue Key, Circle K and Mortar Board, but a recent addition is the Students Service Learning Project. This is a unique organization with more than 100 student volunteers. The students gain practical experience and sometimes class credit by volunteering at a variety of agencies. This may involve visiting the elderly or teaching people to read. Also, students are active in unique projects like developing a public relations plan for a special community service program. Most recently, in conjunction with the United Way, the Students Service Learning Project placed more than 40 students into volunteer community projects.

Charities recently benefiting from Greek organization service projects include the American Diabetes Association, the March of Dimes, and the North Dakota School for the Blind. Whether the fund raiser involves marathon walking, dancing, rocking, or teetering the goal is the same — to do something good for those who need assistance.

I have touched on just a few of the activities which succeed because of dedicated and unselfish student involvement. I also am impressed by the large percentage of students who are working part time to help cover their educational expenses.

The bottom line is that the University of North Dakota has a very fine student body. They are impressive individuals who will guarantee a strong future for our country and most certainly for the state of North Dakota. As alumni, we can be proud of our students and have great confidence in them. In just a few years, they will continue UND's proud tradition of alumni achievement and service.

invited to speak at the University. Interestingly, the controversy and publicity did nothing to enhance the size of the audience, and a large percent of those who did attend walked out before the speech was over. The majority of students paid little or no attention to this highly publicized and controversial event. I personally believe the whole thing was a mistake, not because I felt the speaker would have any influence on

UND medical dean will return to Michigan

Dr. Tom Johnson, dean of the University of North Dakota School of Medicine and executive director of the UND Medical Center, has resigned effective Feb. 29. He will join the administration of the Michigan State University College of Human Medicine.

In the nearly 11 years he has served as dean of the UND School of Medicine, Johnson has led the development of the four-year medical degree-granting and residency training program. The UND Medical Center, of which he is executive director, includes the School of Medicine, College of Nursing, Rehabilitation Hospital and Center for Rural Health Services, Policy and Research.

"Dean Johnson's leadership has guided the UND School of Medicine along a course marked by significant progress and important successes," President Thomas J. Clifford said. "In the spring of 1977 when he came on board, we had just given diplomas to our second class of Doctor of Medicine graduates."

Highlights of Johnson's tenure at UND include securing approval to transfer to North Dakota the third year of medical education, previously conducted in Minnesota; supervising curriculum development to include innovations such as problem-based learning, medical ethics and humanities; developing residency training programs in family medicine, general surgery, internal medicine, psychiatry and pathology; guiding the UND School of Medicine through two critical accreditation reviews; initiating the now nationally recognized rural health center; supporting the continued development of INMED, Indians Into Medicine; guiding the medical school transition from federal "start up" dollars to funding from state resources; and successfully maintaining and enhancing public opinion and support for the School of Medicine through a period of challenging economic conditions in the state of North Dakota.

In his farewell column in the January issue of the School of Medicine Review, Johnson writes about his experience in North Dakota. Excerpts are printed below.

It is always dangerous to write a "reflective" farewell column, but I've been prompted to do it by the number of times individuals have asked me, "What will you miss most about North Dakota?" There are, of course, many responses possible to such a question, some more whimsical than others. On reflection, however, I think what I will miss most about this state is its very personal nature and, with that, the many people I've come to know in North Dakota.

(If I had one wish for the state it would be, "Believe in yourself." I have been discouraged at times these last 11 years by what appears to be feelings of inferiority by North Dakota. We seem to spend a great deal of time and energy apologizing for who and what we are. We tell people how bad North Dakota is, and often forget to promote the myriad of good things and people this state has to offer.

... (Many people have asked me what I'll tell the people in Michigan about North Dakota. I think I will talk a lot about people I have met and come to know in the state, and one person I know I will talk about is one of my favorite North Dakotans—Brynhild Haugland. I first met Representative Haugland in Minot shortly after my arrival. It was one of the best one-and-a-half hours that I have ever spent. I marveled then and continue to be impressed by her abilities, her wisdom, and her ability to make a point—especially an incisive one. Brynhild has been an ardent supporter, both of the medical school and of me, personally. She has been a very special and dear friend, and for all of that I thank her...

I take with me from North Dakota many positive memories and leave, hopefully, many friends... I will miss the very special students we have in school here... I look forward to the challenges of my new position, and I leave confident of the future of the School of Medicine at UND. I will think about North Dakota often.

'Believe in yourself, North Dakota'*

Dr. James is interim dean; screening committee named

Dr. Edwin C. James, chairman of the University of North Dakota's department of surgery, has been named interim dean of the UND School of Medicine effective Feb. 15.

UND President Thomas J. Clifford said James will continue until a permanent dean is selected to replace Dr. Tom Johnson, who resigned to take a position at Michigan State University.

UND President Thomas J. Clifford announced the members of a screening committee to solicit and interview candidates for medical school dean.

The 14-member committee, headed by Dr. John Vennes, chairman of the department of microbiology and immunology, will include James; Dr. Robert Nordlie, chairman of the department of biochemistry and molecular biology; Dr. Clayton Jensen, chairman of the department of family medicine; Dr. Ralph Dunnigan, director of the UND Family Practice Center in Bismarck; Dr. David Rinn, assistant dean at the medical school's northwest campus in Minot; Eileen G. Nelson, assistant professor of pathology; Dr. Lois Merrill, dean of the UND College of Nursing; Dr. Robert M. Wentz, North Dakota state health officer; Terrance G. Brosseau, president of Medcenter One in Bismarck; Dr. Glenn Thoreson, a doctor in family practice in Mayville; John Q. Paulson, manager of the Fargo Clinic; Dr. David C. Engstrom, director of the Veterans Administration Hospital in Fargo, and Kurtis Waters, a second year medical student from Fargo.

Clifford said he hopes to recommend a new dean to the State Board of Higher Education before the beginning of classes this fall.

James, 55, came to UND from West Virginia University Medical Center in 1977, and has been chairman of the surgery department since 1980.

Dr. Edwin C. James

A specialist in thoracic surgery and author of a widely used surgery textbook, James also directs UND's surgery residency program, and is on the active staff of United Hospital in Grand Forks, the UND Medical Center Rehabilitation Hospital, and the U.S. Public Health Hospital in Belcourt, N.D. He also is a consultant to the Veterans Administration Hospital in Fargo and the Grand Forks Air Force Base Hospital.

Fund honors Charles, Mary McCarron Fee

Twenty-one new named endowments have been established within the University of North Dakota Foundation since the start of the 1987-88 fiscal year. The following is just one endowment out of this impressive group.

Dr. Charles H. Fee, '34, '35, of Salem, Ore., and Tucson, Ariz., and Josephine Fee Huey, '31, of Silverdale, Wash., have established the Charles H. and Mary McCarron Fee Memorial Scholarship Endowment in memory of their pioneer parents. This endowment within the UND Foundation will fund annual scholarship awards for students from Walsh County.

Charles and Mary Fee were the children of early pioneers who were instrumental in the settlement and development of Walsh County in North Dakota during the late 1800s. Their parents were part of a group of Irish immigrants that came to the Dakota Territory and established homesteads in the Red River Valley. These pioneers placed a high priority on education, and Charles Sr. attended UND for a short time in 1893.

Foundation news

In 1917, Charles and Mary settled in Park River, N.D., where Charles bought a general store. In 1926, they moved to Grand Forks to enable their three children to attend UND. Their oldest daughter, Anna, received a bachelor's degree in education in 1928. Josephine graduated with a bachelor's degree in education in 1931. Charles Jr. graduated with a bachelor's degree in 1934 and a bachelor's degree in medicine in 1935. He received a medical degree from the University of Chicago Rush Medical School.

Named endowment program boosts Foundation success

changes. It appears that the reverse has been true. Van Eeckhout said, "The named endowment program is really the backbone of the Foundation's success. Since July 1, we have established 21 new named endowments. I think we can compete with any other institution in the country on the success of this very important program for the UND Foundation." With non-endowed accounts taken into consideration, more than 40 funds have been set up in the past six months in honor and recognition of the donors or their loved ones.

The establishment of these named endowments has qualified the donors for recognition as members of a UND Foundation Giving Club. Since the beginning of the current fiscal year, the Foundation has recognized four new UND Benefactors with gifts of more than $100,000, and 40 new UND President Club memberships with gifts of more than $10,000. Many of these individuals upgraded memberships from the Old Main Society and the UND '83 Society at the $5,000 and $1,000 levels respectively, while 33 new memberships were recorded in these clubs. Giving Club memberships at the UND '83 Society and above level now number 1,677.

"The theme of the 1987-88 annual drive is 'making the difference,'" said UND Alumni Association and Foundation Executive Vice President Earl Strinden. "We are most gratified to see the tremendous support and interest in the University of North Dakota by our loyal alumni and friends. This support has truly made a difference in providing the margin of excellence necessary to provide quality education for our youth, and everyone at UND is most grateful."

Career considerations are bright for occupational therapy majors

By KATHRYN SWENEY

In a time when many college students have difficulty finding employment after graduation, occupational therapy students at the University of North Dakota can expect up to 200 notices about job openings in their senior year.

An estimated 10,000 occupational therapy positions were unfilled in 1986, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and the number is expected to increase 60 percent by 1995. The success of occupational therapy in the rehabilitation of disabled persons and the aging population in the United States has created an urgent need for more trained and registered therapists.

However, there are no on-the-job training opportunities. All registered occupational therapists first must complete an accredited educational program. UND has one of only 60 accredited occupational therapy programs in the United States—and the only one in a region including Montana, Wyoming, Utah, Arizona, New Mexico, South Dakota and Iowa.

Competition is strong among students who want to enroll in occupational therapy programs. "We interviewed 76 students last year for the 36 available positions," says Sue McIntyre, chairman of UND's occupational therapy department. The program is rigorous. In addition to academic work, students must complete six to nine months of supervised field experience.

Occupational therapy is medical treatment prescribed by a physician to rehabilitate the physically or mentally sick or injured. Through occupational therapy, patients improve physical functions and adjust to mental or physical disabilities or injuries. Therapeutic activities range from crafts such as weaving and metalcraft to complex skills such as creative writing and the study of psychology. Adapted self-care skills are included in the program, such as dressing, housework, and caring for children.

Although occupational therapy is noted for activities, occupational therapists also use splints, braces, adaptive devices, progressive resistive exercises, methods of diagnostic testing, gait training and postural training in their work.

As a profession, occupational therapy grew in demand after each of the World Wars. UND's occupational therapy program began in 1954, and is accredited by the American Medical Association and the American Occupational Therapy Association.

The UND program is a combination of training in physical and biological sciences, sociology, psychology and creative skills, plus clinical experience in hospitals and health agencies, McIntyre says.

Once accepted into the professional program, juniors and seniors begin the sequential study of human development from embryo to adult.

"Students learn what is normal development at each level, and how to identify problems pertinent to occupational therapy," McIntyre says.

"We certainly cover a lot of areas," Bob Cunningham says. A senior in occupational therapy from Thompson, N.D., Cunningham agrees that the program is a lot of work, adding "it's also a lot of fun."

"The students in this program are treated as individuals. The instructors take time to get to know the students, and to keep up with the students even after graduation," Cunningham says. The personalized attention makes the effort worthwhile.

Cunningham says he is looking forward to his six-month field experience, which will be in St. Cloud and Rochester, Minn. Students may be assigned to facilities in North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Montana, Wyoming, Arizona, Nebraska or Iowa. After graduation, students are eligible to take the national certification examination; 98 percent of UND's students pass the exam to become registered occupational therapists.

Although accredited and in demand, the department has areas for improvement. The department needs space and equipment to keep the program going, McIntyre notes. Some classes are held in McCannell Hall hallways and conference rooms. Handicap facilities are improvised.

Equipment such as 18 plinths, large padded benches which cost $900 apiece, is needed. Classes currently use the plinths in the physical therapy department.

In spite of the physical plant, the department has a national reputation for excellence and innovation. In October, UND presented the first occupational therapy workshop in the country about working with AIDS patients as part of an educational conference for field work supervisors. The department also was awarded the first national scholar-in-residence, a program sponsored by the American Occupational Therapy Association to alleviate the nationwide shortage of occupational therapy instructors. In all, two scholars-in-residence have been sponsored at UND, the only program nationally to have such a distinction, McIntyre said.

Locally, the department received the

OT graduate finds symptom of Alzheimer's

By KATHRYN SWENEY

Discovered in 1906, Alzheimer's disease once was considered a rare mental disorder. Now the fourth most common cause of death in adults, Alzheimer's usually is proved only through an autopsy, which shows a brain altered in a unique way.

Recently, a symptom of Alzheimer's was discovered by Joan Ungerecht Thralow, a 1963 occupational therapy graduate from the University of North Dakota. Thralow and her partner, registered nurse Bob Steffes, discovered that Alzheimer's patients have a severely limited field of vision.

"This symptom can become a new diagnostic tool which can separate victims of Alzheimer's from patients suffering with similar disorders," Thralow said.

Thralow and Steffes work at the Veterans Administration Medical Center in St. Cloud, Minn.

Alzheimer's is a progressive disease. Typical symptoms are memory loss, confusion, impairment of judgment, inability to perform daily tasks, difficulty in movement, lack of spontaneity, inability to converse, erratic mood swings and personality changes. Because these symptoms often appear in the aging process, early detection of the disease has been difficult.

"Alzheimer's disease has no cure or treatment at this time," Thralow said. "Therefore, management of the victim of the disease is essential in minimizing the devastation created by the Alzheimer's."

Thralow and Steffes collaborated on the research project at the hospital and published an article "Visual Field Limitation in the Patient with Dementia of the Alzheimer's Type" in the May 1987 issue of the Journal of American Geriatrics. They also presented this paper at a national conference on Alzheimer's in May. For Thralow, it is her third published paper about the Alzheimer's patient's visual field.

Thralow is continuing her research, currently making studies to identify cognitive levels of performance of Alzheimer's patients. She also is active in the Minnesota occupational therapy organization, serving on the executive board.

Thralow and her husband, David, '60, have five children, and live on a farm near St. Cloud. Oldest son Daniel is a 1987 UND graduate.

Whittaker's career is worldwide whirlwind

Spectrum of studies encompasses women's roles, alcohol, psychology

By SUE BERG

A 20 minute visit with Sandra Oshel Whittaker, '58, will take your breath away.

A woman who reaches possibly 5 feet tall in high heels, this University of North Dakota graduate is a dynamo who can pack a conversation with facts, anecdotes and even humor about alcoholism and other psychological research that has taken her worldwide.

Whittaker's husband Jim, who towers over his wife, also is an authority on conducting alcoholism research. Together, they have been around the world twice, and lived in Beirut, Hong Kong, Auckland and Buenos Aires, all in pursuit of knowledge about the psychology of people. In the process, as Sandy Whittaker tells it, she "has dodged small frogs loaded with neurotoxins up the Amazon, traded for boar's tooth necklaces in Sepik river villages in Papua New Guinea, learned to shoot a blow-dart gun, swung on jungle vines and climbed the Great Wall of China."

After almost 30 years of studying alcoholism among minorities; after more than 1 million psychology students around the world have used their textbooks in English, Spanish and Portuguese; after 10 years of legislative experience in Pennsylvania, Sandy Whittaker found time to return to UND to accept a Sioux Award this fall.

The award surprised Whittaker, who says she felt "tremendously honored," adding, "it's such a thrill for me." A moment later, Whittaker breaks from the on-campus interview to exchange greetings with Dr. Sharon Wilsnack, a UND neuroscience professor whose research focuses on women and alcoholism. In another breath, Whittaker returns, talking about her reflections of UND.

"UND is an excellent school," Whittaker says. "I came away understanding down deep that women are expected to excel and succeed. And that philosophy—among colleges and universities—was 20 years ahead of its time."

"I always thought North Dakota reflected the way relationships existed—equal. This University has been a shining light in its treatment of women. It was among the early few to elevate women to full professorships. It has good role models for both sexes."

It turns out that Whittaker married one of her role models. The pair met when she was a student in Jim Whittaker's abnormal psychology class at UND. She graduated in 1958 with a bachelor's degree in speech therapy and with a husband. Two years later, Whittaker and Whittaker were living on the Standing Rock Sioux Reservation, near Fort Yates, N.D., making the first Native American-commissioned study of alcoholism among Indians. In 1981, Jim Whittaker conducted a 20-year follow-up study, the "first longitudinal study of its kind among Native Americans," Sandy Whittaker says. In the meantime, Whittaker earned a master's degree in 1967 from North Dakota State University, and had two children.

Sandy Whittaker is perhaps more widely recognized as a lecturer and consultant about roles of women in third world nations, and comparing the roles to those in the United States. The study of women's roles is a by-product of the research she and her husband have carried out worldwide. "It may be less scientific, but more popular among all kinds of audiences," Whittaker says.

"So many different fields need to know more about women in other countries. I can talk to business one day, the medical field another day."

In many developing nations, the roles of women follow old-fashioned views, ranging from slavery to chattel, Whittaker explains. For example, in a country where wood is scarce, a load of wood is more valuable than a woman.

"It is hard as an observer to see half of humanity afforded a place below a load of wood," Whittaker says. In another example, Whittaker described large factories in China with 2,500 employees and about 250 in management. With some luck, one of the top administrators would be a woman, Whittaker says.

The lecture circuit isn't enough to keep Whittaker busy, however. After the Sioux Awards banquet, Whittaker and husband Jim, newly retired from Penn State, traveled to Helsinki, Finland, to extend their alcoholism research; from there the couple went to Leningrad to "fulfill a dream to see the treasures of the Hermitage," Sandy said. In January, the duo moved on to visit Antarctica. And if that wasn't enough, a fifth edition of their psychology text is slated to come out.

"This is prime time," Sandy Whittaker says.

By AMY L. GEISZLER

As she reminisces about more than 30 years of teaching, it becomes clear that 97-year-old Hazel MacMaster, '14, was probably a teacher who made lasting impressions. Many of her students have kept in touch with her over the years. The students who haven't are reprimanded when she sees them at school reunions.

"So many of my former students still live in Grand Forks and when they tell me that at reunions, I ask them, 'Then why haven't you visited me?'," she said. MacMaster resides in an apartment near downtown Grand Forks.

MacMaster taught biology at Central High School in Grand Forks between 1921 until her "first" retirement in 1949 at age 58.

"I quit before I had to because I thought I was through teaching," she said. But after a few years of retirement she decided she had been too young to quit. She returned to the teaching profession in 1956 at age 65, this time at her alma mater, the University of North Dakota. She retired a second time from teaching in 1960.

Reflecting on her teaching career, MacMaster said, "I just loved my students, and I never had any trouble with them. I think whatever a person does should be the right thing for them. I certainly think teaching was the right thing for me. Although maybe some of my students would disagree," she added, laughing.

"I think if I were to teach again, I would teach math. I wouldn't have to read and remember so much, because they are always discovering so much in the field of biology. In math, it's either the right answer or the wrong answer."

Although retired, MacMaster has remained active. Between 1960 and 1961, she worked part-time as a school librarian. An avid bridge player, Mac-

Master said, "I didn't want to work full-time because I liked to play bridge in the afternoon."

Another favorite hobby has been reading, because, "now I can read and then forget about the things I just read," she joked. "When I was a teacher, I had to remember what I read."

A member of teacher organizations, MacMaster still attends meetings whenever possible. She particularly enjoys attending reunions to catch up with former colleagues and students.

For 11 summers of her retirement, MacMaster was assistant manager at a private resort club in Michigan. The club was managed by a former Central High School teacher and staffed by UND students. MacMaster said the club members were mostly "down-to-earth" millionaires.

MacMaster was born near New Rockford, N.D. in 1891, and was raised in Lakota, N.D. Her father was an insurance salesman, and her mother took care of the family of seven girls and one boy. All eight of the MacMaster children attended UND at one time or another. Four earned degrees from UND.

"Once we graduated (from high school) we were expected to go to college. There was no question about it. We weren't asked if we wanted to go, we just went," MacMaster said. Her father stressed higher education, although he himself had not earned a degree.

MacMaster and her sister, Marion, being the two eldest, were the first to come to UND. The sisters shared a room in Davis Hall, and Hazel was a member of the Delta Gamma sorority.

After two years at UND, the sisters spent a year in Scotland visiting their paternal grandparents, who were "gentlemen farmers." The sinking of the Titanic occurred during their stay, and it scared the two girls, who worried about getting home. Their fears subsided once they were aboard their homeward-bound ship, MacMaster said.

MacMaster resumed her studies at UND, graduating in 1914. She majored in German because she had taken four years of the language in high school, and "it seemed so easy to learn."

But after graduation, she sought a teaching job in the field of her minor, biology, because, "We were in a war with Germany at that time so German was not popular in the United States."

Her first teaching job was at her former high school in Lakota. After four years there, she taught at Hope, N.D., for one year.

"Then I thought I would become a businesswoman," she said. After one year of business school, she realized she preferred to teach. A position for a biology teacher was open in Central High School, and she was hired in 1921.

MacMaster also earned a master's degree in science from Columbia University in New York.

Fast-growing financial services industry is new UND study focus

By SUE BERG

Jim Dahlen, a senior at the University of North Dakota, is looking forward to the day when he will manage millions of dollars in investments for the trust department of a major bank.

Or, he may become a corporate treasurer, responsible for developing sources of new capital so that his business can expand into new products and markets.

Or, he may become a real estate, securities or insurance professional, with the special expertise to provide "financial planning" for individuals and families.

Dahlen initially planned to graduate this December with a management major from UND's highly-rated College of Business and Public Administration, the only one in North Dakota whose undergraduate program is accredited by the American Assembly of Collegiate Schools of Business.

Instead, he will extend his stay for another semester to enroll in a selection of courses in UND's newest academic unit, the Department of Finance.

"The demand in the market is increasing for people who understand finance, and this (program) will give me lots more opportunities," said Dahlen, a native of Edmore, N.D. "I'd like to find a position either in banking or in a multi-national firm. If it's possible, I'd like to stay in North Dakota."

The financial service industry is a popular field among college students today. In addition to the excitement and glamour of working with money, the industry offers numerous opportunities, employing more than 1.5 million people, said Dr. Rolf Tedefalk, chairman of the finance department. At the UND College of Business and Public Administration, signs already point to its growing popularity.

"We have resources—instructors and courses—to handle 35 to 40 financial management majors this year," Tedefalk said. "So far, more than 50 students have expressed an interest in being admitted to the program." Dahlen adds that although the program hasn't been advertised much yet, word-of-mouth is spreading quickly among students who are interested in finance.

Fred Lawrence, now in his second year as dean of the business college, closely watches trends in business and implements appropriate changes in the curriculum.

"The financial service industry is one of the fastest growing sectors in the economy," Lawrence said. "We want to give our graduates the same opportunities that they may find at other schools."

Although finance studies previously were available through the economics and management departments at UND, students now can focus their studies directly on financial planning, real estate, investments, corporate finance and insurance. The new program and department were approved in April 1987 by the State Board of Higher Education in North Dakota.

The financial management major combines courses previously offered through the Department of Management with half a dozen or so new courses. From the management department, a sampling of courses includes Principles of Finance, Investment Analysis and Portfolio Management, and International Financial Management. New courses include Capital Market Theory, Financial Data Inputs, and Capital Market Financing and Investment Strategies.

The program aims to give students a thorough background in theory and application. Students must successfully complete foundation courses in accounting, economics and statistics, and be enrolled in the first finance course before being formally accepted as a financial management major. Tedefalk notes that students will need "a thorough understanding of finance theory and enjoy working with computers and statistics" to succeed in the program.

A significant part of the financial management program is the internship. Now known as "cooperative education programs," the internships are being aranged to provide students with invaluable hands-on experience in regional firms such as banks, brokerage houses, mortgage and insurance companies and entrepreneurial North Dakota enterprises.

"We are aggressively seeking internships for our students in Grand Forks and the surrounding area," Tedefalk said. "Going right from school into a profession is very difficult without experience." The interest among students to participate in internships is quite high, Tedefalk added.

The chairman believes that the program "is unique to the Midwest because it prepares students for immediate employment."

"Many other undergraduate finance programs—such as the one at the University of Minnesota in Minneapolis—are really preparatory work for graduate study," Tedefalk said. "We're particularly interested in seeing our students work in small, entrepreneurial firms. We envision many of our graduates becoming financial officers in developing small firms in North Dakota."

Occupational therapy

UND Lucille McDermott award for teaching and service excellence last year; three instructors have won teaching awards since 1972. Faculty members are active community volunteers as board members and consultants with several programs in Grand Forks and Crookston, Minn., including facilities for the chronically mentally ill, addiction counseling and sheltered workshops. Three professors are making video tapes of suggested activities for kidney dialysis patients who have to sit for four to six hours at a time.

Occupational therapy has moved into high tech in other ways as well. Faculty members use computers to help patients with head injuries improve their memories and coordination, and to evaluate the patients' progress. Computers are used with arthritic children who must move painful joints to maintain motor dexterity. Occupational therapists also use computers to evaluate paranoid schizophrenics because they interact more easily with a computer than with a human being.

A new project for the department will explore a partnership with Creighton University in Omaha, Neb., using an instructional development grant. Creighton, with more equipment money, will purchase equipment for both universities to use. UND occupational therapy faculty will provide expertise in working with students from a predominately rural area. Although Creighton is in a larger city, the majority of their students also come from a rural area.

VP Osmon typifies loyalty of 3M employees

among its 60 plus business units, and that supports and rewards cooperation, innovation and creative risk-taking.

A tradition of patience with new ideas, and of tolerating "failure," has served 3M well, Osmon said, because it reduces the stresses that typically limit human potential in large organizations.

"We don't believe that necessity is the mother of invention," he said. "Opportunity is."

For decades, 3M's competitors have been mystified by the McKnight heritage—a company that generates a continuous flow of products developed within its own laboratories (last year, more than 20 percent of sales were of products introduced within the previous five years).

Osmon's own career is illustrative of some of the themes of the 3M corporate culture.

Flipping through a staff directory, Osmon pointed out that few of the senior people have the Ivy League credentials that dominate many corporations of 3M's size. Most of his colleagues in the executive suite are graduates of public universities. Most came from modest economic circumstances, but with a high motivation to succeed.

Osmon noted, too, that his rise in the company did not occur overnight. Virtually all of the senior executives have been with 3M for 30 years or more. Like Osmon, most have never worked for another company.

In fact, Osmon said, most of 3M's key positions—including, most significantly, those in research and development—are filled by people who are committing their entire careers to the company.

This pattern of loyalty contrasts sharply with the attitudes found in much of American business, Osmon said. A typical corporate career calls for jumping ship whenever greater opportunity knocks. And most companies rely upon hiring away talented employees from other companies rather than developing their own.

Osmon joined 3M in 1957, fresh out of UND and two years with the U.S. Army Medical Corps. Hired, he thought, as a marketing specialist, Osmon was notified on his first day that there were no openings in this field. Instead, the company put Osmon to work as a laboratory assistant, encouraging him to learn as much as possible while waiting for a new assignment.

Osmon has held at least 15 different jobs in the years since. Like most 3M senior executives, his career has included substantial international experience, perhaps not surprising for a company that derives 40 percent of its sales abroad.

Over the years, company assignments have taken Osmon to 50 countries. He lived in Great Britain from 1976 to 1979 as managing director and chief operating executive for 3M's United Kingdom subsidiary. Then, until 1983 when he assumed most of his present responsibilities, Osmon was in charge of 3M's operations in Africa, Latin America and the Middle East.

Today, Osmon oversees the selling of hundreds of products, ranging from the ubiquitous Scotch brand tape to surgical equipment to advanced ceramic materials used in the space program.

He also manages the company's public and governmental relations programs, with the aim of enhancing 3M's image while helping to create an environment in which the company can do business. An important internal communications task is to keep alive the traditions that have served the company so well.

His current executive responsibilities have not kept Osmon within the borders of the United States, however. When interviewed by the Alumni Review, he was on the eve of a whirlwind trip to finalize details for 3M's major sponsorship of the 1988 Olympic games in Canada and South Korea.

Osmon declined to specify how much it cost 3M to obtain Olympic sponsorship rights. But he believes the investment will yield rich dividends worldwide, especially in differentiating 3M from its competitors and in enhancing the company's reputation as a global developer and marketer of quality products.

Osmon intends to make sure the expensive Olympic connection is properly marketed. It involves more than just placing the Olympic logo on 3M product packaging and including the slogan "Supporting the Dream" in 3M advertising.

For example, 3M's Canadian subsidiary will outfit the 10,000 participants in the Winter Games torch relay in jackets and pants made of Thintech brand fabric.

Another example: during the Summer Games, 3M will introduce the Pacific Rim countries to a new Scotch-shield brand safety and security film for windows that is effective in protecting people from flying glass shattered during earthquakes.

Some of Osmon's time in the next year will be devoted to his duties as the newly elected chairman of the Minnesota Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

June will probably bring Osmon and his wife Nancy (Saylor), '55, to UND for a meeting of Alumni Association and Foundation board of directors, upon which Donn has served since 1983. He is proud that 3M employees lead UND alumni in the number of company-matched gifts to the Foundation's annual Sustaining Fund Drive.

And, he laughed, he expects to spend some time in the UND Bookstore, quietly observing the response of customers to the dozens of 3M products sold there.
