Gustaf, Mildred Thelin join ranks of multi-million dollar donors to UND Foundation

Gift of $4 million will aid medical-related research, UND-Lake Region priority projects

By DAVE VORLAND

The late Gustaf "Gus" and Mildred Thelin, '18, Devils Lake, N.D., pioneer brother and sister and University of North Dakota benefactors, were remembered recently at a special dinner at the J. Lloyd Stone Alumni Center on campus.

The event was to mark the placement of the Thelin names on the UND Foundation's Wall of Honor, commemorating their posthumous membership in the exclusive William Budge Society. They join seven others who have made gifts to the UND Foundation in excess of one million dollars.

The Thelin gifts, valued at more than $4 million, are the assets they had placed in a charitable remainder unitrust during their lifetimes. The revenues from $2.3 million that provided their retirement income now will be used for medical-related research at UND and income from $1.7 million will be used for priority projects at UND-Lake Region in Devils Lake.

Joining President Thomas J. Clifford, UND-Lake Region Dean Sharon Etemad, and other UND and Foundation officials were representatives of the Ramsey National Bank and Trust Co. of Devils Lake, and the Thelins' attorney, John Haugland.

The bank, and especially Haugland, played an important role in UND receiving the gift. In addition to insuring that the Thelin's philanthropic intentions were fulfilled, Clifford said, Haugland had to battle an East Coast financial institution that only reluctantly backed off from a dubious claim on the trust.

Haugland regaled the gathering with reminiscences about the Thelins, his longtime friends.

He noted that Gustaf and Mildred's parents, Anna and John Thelin, immigrated to the United States from Sweden in the late 1880s, settling near Devils Lake. One of their children, Valdemar, died in 1939. Gustaf and Mildred, who attended UND and for a time was registrar at what is today Mayville State University, continued to operate the farm.

They also became successful investors, Haugland said, remaining thrifty and frugal even after they became millionaires. Neither married. They enjoyed reading and travel, he recalled, and were "rugged individualists" who advocated that: "the least government is always the best government."

Clifford recalled meeting Gus Thelin in the early 1970s when he was considering whether to name UND as the eventual trust beneficiary. Among other things, the two learned they shared an interest in trees. They arranged to plant several burr oaks on campus from the nursery Thelin established and cared for well into his 80s.

Mildred Thelin died in 1976. Gus died this past October at the age of 90.

Clifford praised the Thelins for being forward looking and socially conscious people who wanted to see the fruits of their labor used to help others.

He noted the gift will give UND's Lake Region branch a source of "academic venture" capital to allow it to exercise flexibility and creativity in meeting its mission. UND-Lake Region was placed under the University's jurisdiction by the 1987 Legislature.

The gift also will strengthen the ability of UND medical researchers to make their unique contributions toward the conquering of disease. One early project to be funded from the Thelin Endowment, Clifford said, involves scientific study of the cancer producing Radon gas, which is relatively common in North Dakota.

"Gustaf and Mildred had a great respect and appreciation for their North Dakota heritage and for the pioneers who settled these vast prairies," said Earl Strinden, executive vice president of the UND Foundation. "Their most generous gift will be a living memorial to their pioneer spirit and that of their parents and the many other pioneers who made great sacrifices and overcame countless obstacles to build a better life for future generations."

Attending a special dinner to recognize the Thelin million-dollar gifts were George Cox, '78, executive vice-president of the Ramsey National Bank and Trust Co.; UND President Thomas J. Clifford; John Haugland, '42, Thelin attorney; UND-Lake Region Dean Sharon Etemad; and Lynn Hoghaug, '65, president of Ramsey National Bank and Trust Co.

Why are these otherwise normal people donning this strange garb and striking peculiar poses?

Quality education needs effort from all levels

By EARL STRINDEN
Executive Vice President
Alumni Association

North Dakota was one of the few states to receive a "passing grade" when Secretary of Education William J. Bennett presented his "report card" on elementary and secondary education in our nation. North Dakota was one of the few states to show an improvement in the national standardized test scores.

This is good news, but I'm afraid it speaks more to the rather sorry state of educational quality nationwide rather than to any great improvements for the most favorable teacher-to-student classroom ratios. Then, of course, the strong emphasis mothers and fathers place on education and the very active involvement by most parents in school activities are most important. I believe this is a primary reason why North Dakota has the distinction of having the highest high school graduation rate in the nation. Recently released statistics show that in our state 94.8 percent of those who begin high school graduate. The national average is 73.9 percent. Our neighboring state of Minnesota ranks second with a 90.7 percent graduation rate. South Dakota is fifth with 85 percent, and Montana is tenth with 83.1 percent.

The demographics of North Dakota have been changing for many decades. Our aging population and the movement from rural to urban centers have forced consolidation of school districts. As this pattern continues, the consolidation problems become more difficult and painful. For most communities the school is not only an economic factor, but serves as a center for social and community activities. Many of the urban centers in our nation are plagued by overcrowding, while much of rural America is attempting to deal with the problem of providing quality and diversified educational opportunities for a sparse population. An interim committee of the North Dakota legislature is exploring ways of using telecommunications and modern technology to bring the best possible educational programming into the classroom.

To maintain a high quality for public education, the higher education system must be closely and directly involved. In the early days of our state, the University of North Dakota was in fact the Department of Public Education. Beatrice Johnstone, Neil McDonald and Minnie Nelson, early educational leaders, built a close and productive working relationship between the University and virtually all of the public schools throughout North Dakota. The first extension division for our state was initiated in 1919, when President Thomas Kane's old friend, Albert Yoder, arrived on the UND campus to assume this responsibility. The extension division organized the state Parent Teachers Association and served as its general headquarters. In succeeding years, other institutions of higher learning became involved in public school relations, and responsibilities earlier assumed by UND were transferred to the Department of Public Instruction in Bismarck.

The changing demographics in North Dakota also are of great concern to the institutions of higher learning. We can take pride in the fact that our state also leads the nation in the percentage of high school graduates who go on to post secondary education. The colleges and universities, however, will find an increasing role in the re-educating and retraining of older than average students.

The bottom line is that it will be increasingly difficult for a small population state to support a quality system of education from kindergarten through advanced degrees. The need for cooperation, coordination and sound planning is paramount. The institutions of higher learning must be a strong resource in helping the elementary and secondary schools of the state to adequately fulfill their missions. At the same time, the determination must be made as to what higher education opportunities should be provided and where. I am confident North Dakota will retain its high standing on educational matters as it relates to the other states in our nation. This will not happen, however, without sound planning and exceptional leadership by the education professionals and elected officials. The people of North Dakota must continue to place a high priority on the importance of education!

Report from campus

those states who were the winners. North Dakota also has its problems, both immediate and long-range. We can rightfully be proud of the high priority education always has been given by the people of North Dakota. This goes back to the pioneering days when country schools and country churches dotted these great prairies, and institutions of higher learning were located to be easily accessible to most of our citizens. We still rank as one of the top states in the nation in per capita support for education, and North Dakota also has one of

Hot air (before and during) fueled Australia flight

By BOB LIND

Adventure calls and a few hardy men are responding—men from North Dakota and Montana who modestly describe themselves as "courageous, with good humor, responsible, honest, skilled, competitive, with good looks and sharp wits." And maybe a little craziness, too, although that's not listed in their official resume. These are the heroic men who, with their feet in the clouds and their tongues in their cheeks, will be participating in the wild and woolly Flags Inn Bicentennial Trans-Australia Ballooning Challenge from March 30 to April 15.

Their balloon will fly about 3,600 miles, in spurts, across Australia, taking it to such exotic spots as Dubbo, Kalgoolie and Cocklebidly, which has a gas station and a motel and that's all.

It's not a race; rather, the balloonists will attempt to score points through such competitive events as dropping beanbags close to a big "X" on the ground.

The team with the most points will win the $20,000 first prize. That's in Australian money, which is $14,000 American. "But the money isn't the main thing," says John Boulger, a Fargo attorney and a member of the team. "It's just good to be in this once-in-a-lifetime experience."

Other team members are Rich Burns, a Fargo architect; Rolf

Sletten, a Bismarck attorney; and Jim Kack, former president of the Gold Seal Co. and now a businessman in Bozeman, Mont.

The balloon event is part of Australia's celebration of its 200th birthday. It is sponsored by the Flag Inns motel group, with 75 balloons from 14 nations taking part.

There was a feverish competition among balloonists to be selected to participate. With Boulger and Co., it involved a let-it-all-hang-out type of public relations campaign.

The local team's participation in the event came about because balloonists Boulger and Sletten also race gumi boats, those homemade crafts floating on inflated rubber tubes.

Gumi boat racing took Boulger and Sletten and other racers to Australia. The visit turned them into Australia fans. Then, for good measure, Boulger met Ruth Wilson, who is in charge of the bicentennial balloon event.

Wilson was hunting for people with personalities, not just good balloonists, for the balloon challenge. Hearing that was all it took for these four guys of good humor, skill, sharp wit, et cetera (see the first paragraph for a complete list of their attributes) to form a team and launch a magnificent campaign.

They had their pictures taken in an assortment of costumes in an assortment of situations, and sent them to Wilson, one at a time, in hopes she'd say, "We have to have this group from North Dakota!"

They posed as fearless World War I pilots; as members of a safari; as students in the country school at Bonanzaville; as rough, tough gunslingers; and diplomatically standing in front of an Australian flag—"We left nothing to chance," Boulger says.

Their campaign worked. Even before they'd sent in all their pictures, Wilson told them, "Don't worry, you're in."

They've named themselves the Dakota Roughriders Aeronautical Exposition in honor of North Dakota's centennial in 1989. They'll be flying a balloon provided by their sponsor, Kodak of Australia. They're also trying to land other sponsors.

Their chase team will include Kack's wife Joanne, Debra Bauer of Minneapolis and a couple from Australia's Wagga-Wagga who are Boulger-Boulger's good friends-friends.

The race will, as the rules explain, cover a route offering "few facilities." The route, in fact, crosses a desert called the Nullarbor Plain, the name of which means "no tree" in Latin, and which is so barren of towns it makes central North Dakota look like downtown New York.

The balloons will descend at the few towns they encounter, including Kimba, which is described in Ballooning magazine as a "lovely flying area with silos in the main street for reference points for lost navigators."

They can expect a royal welcome and entertainment and much curiosity at each community. "We look forward to showing them we are friendly Americans, and are good ambassadors for our country, our state and our sponsor," Boulger says.

If nothing else, he hopes the team can educate the Australians on U.S. geography. Boulger says Wilson once thought they were all from South Dakota.

Boulger says he and his teammates feel good about being invited to participate. "It's quite a compliment," he says.

But then, Wilson was seeking "fun-loving" people to participate. There's no question about it: With the Dakota Roughrider Aeronautical Expedition, she accomplished her mission.

EDITOR'S NOTE: Most of the participants are UND graduates—Rolf Sletten, '71, '74; Jim Kack, '63 (former Alumni Association President); John Boulger, '74; and Joanne Schaffer Kack, '63. We have asked the group to give us a firsthand report of their experiences in a future issue of the Alumni Review.

Alumni Days '88 is fast approaching, May 25-27

Alumni Days '88, a time for sharing and reminiscing with classmates, is set for May 25-27 at the University of North Dakota. As reservations come in from across the United States, predictions are favoring an excellent turnout.

Alumni Days is an opportunity to join classmates from years gone by in a visit to the UND campus. As Karleen Home Rosaen, '27, said when she returned last spring, "You'll share the tears you've shed, the bluebirds you've heard, the rungs of the ladder you've climbed through the years, and you'll cherish the ease with which you share."

The graduating Classes of 1928, 1933 and 1938 are the featured class reunions of Alumni Days. Special activities also are planned for former students of the School of Medicine, School of Law, School of Engineering and Mines, School of Communication—previously the Journalism and Speech Departments—and the Accounting Department. Invitations are extended as well to graduates of surrounding class years to join the Alumni Days festivities.

Swanson Hall is designated as the reunion headquarters. Registration and check in begins 1 p.m. Wednesday, May 25. All alumni and friends are invited to the open house 3-5 p.m. Wednesday at the J. Lloyd Stone Alumni Center, followed by a get-reacquainted dinner in the Memorial Union Terrace Dining Room. The evening concludes with a cabaret mixer.

Thursday, May 26, opens with a concert tour of the UND campus. The tour includes a visit to the Chester Fritz Auditorium for a special musical performance followed by class photos. Then it is on to the Hughes Fine Arts Center to view the Margaret Cable and James Carley pottery collections. Afternoon activities include a luncheon cruise aboard the Dakota Queen riverboat and a reception at the home of President and Mrs. Thomas J. Clifford.

The Alumni Days Sioux Awards banquet begins with a social hour at 6:30 p.m. Thursday at the Westward Ho, followed by dinner and the program at 7:30 p.m. Sioux Award recipients are Thomas McGrath, '39, Richard McGee, '41, Ludwik Kulas, '43, and Mildred Burns Johnson, '39. Charles Breit-wieser, '31, is unable to attend Alumni Days and will receive his Sioux Award at a later date. Tickets for the banquet cost $15 per person.

Activities conclude Friday, May 27, with a special atmosphere presentation. Tours will be available to the Hyslop Sports Center, Ralph Engestad Arena, Chester Fritz Library, Energy and Mineral Research Center, and other buildings as requested. The President's Farewell Buffet is set for noon in the Memorial Union Terrace Dining Room.

For more information, contact the Alumni Center, P.O. Box 8157 University Station, Grand Forks, ND 58202 or call (701) 777-2611 or toll free outside North Dakota at 1-800-543-8764.

Labor official sees rise in 'people value' in workforce of future

By SUE BERG

The shape of the workforce by the year 2000 will be dramatically different than it is today. In fact, strikes and antagonisms may be only memories.

These are the forecasts of Salvatore R. Martoche, '67, assistant secretary for labor-management standards, U.S. Department of Labor.

Martoche, a graduate of the University of North Dakota law school, returned to campus as the keynote speaker at the Robert Rushing annual management-labor relations conference in November.

As a senior Labor Department official who has studied labor issues and international economic competition, Martoche asserts that in the 21st century, there will be a job for every qualified person in the United States.

"Job increases won't be coming from manufacturing and blue collar areas," he says. "Instead, look for employment in the service sector."

At the same time, more women, immigrants and minority youths will be joining the workforce. "These new workers will be entering the job market at a time when advanced skills will be a necessity," Martoche says. "Businesses will find themselves providing more training, more flexibility and more fringe benefits, such as child care. As the value of their employees increases, companies will want to keep workers in whom they've invested training on the job."

Greater cooperation between labor and management—and fewer strikes—then may result. "It must, if we're to succeed," Martoche emphasizes. "We're in a world where there's global economic competition. To compete effectively, we'll have to be more efficient. Everyone must become more flexible. Companies will have to cater to their employees as valued people."

In his Labor Department position, Martoche heads the Office of Labor Management Standards and reports directly to the Secretary of Labor. The agency headquarters is in Washington, D.C., but most of its 450 staff work in OLMS field offices in 30 cities throughout the United States. The field offices are staffed primarily with investigators. OLMS administrators and enforces most of the provisions of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959.

Martoche explains that OLMS performs four types of activities: public disclosure of reports required by LMRDA, compliance audits to ensure that unions are following LMRDA provisions, civil and criminal investigations particularly with regard to union officer elections and handling of union funds, and education and compliance assistance to help union members understand their rights and to comply with LMRDA provisions.

Last year, Martoche brought about 200 cases to the U.S. attorneys around the nation for prosecution under the act.

Martoche took office as assistant secretary in July 1986. Previously, he served as U.S. attorney for the western district of New York from May 1982. He also had a private law practice.

Martoche, a New York native, decided to study law at UND through the encouragement of a friend. During his studies, he met his wife, Mary Dee Benesh, '67, of Bismarck.

The pair married the day before Martoche graduated from law school in 1967. They packed a U-haul and moved to New York, where Benesh earned a law degree in 1977 from the State University of New York at Buffalo.

"I admire my wife," Martoche says. "She's extraordinary. She started law school with two children, and she graduated on time three years later with three children. Good Norwegian stock!"

Benesh works in the Surface Mine and Reclamation Agency in the Department of the Interior, also in Washington, D.C. "Her affinity for North Dakota piqued her interest in land reclamation," Martoche says.

The Martoches have three teenage children, Amy, Claire and Christopher. In spare moments, Martoche enjoys photography and sailing. With his usual good humor, he says, "I'm a lousy, struggling sailor, but I do it anyway." He has a 19 foot sailboat on a small lake in upstate New York—where shore is never out of sight.

'Rapids' on the Red?

Engineering professor designs model of proposed boat chute

Lloyd Omdahl, North Dakota lieutenant governor and former UND faculty member, listens as Chuck Turner, associate professor of civil engineering, points out features of this one-twelfth scale model of a proposed boat chute for the new Riverside Dam to be built on the Red River in Grand Forks. The original dam, built in 1925, is unsound and will be replaced by a "staircase" dam. The proposed boat chute, which is being considered now by the Grand Forks City Council, would provide safe navigation past the dam for paddle craft and would also offer a white rapids area for recreation. The proposed boat chute would be 200 feet long and would drop 13 vertical feet. This model, housed in UND's Upson I engineering building, is contained in a box 32 feet long by 12 feet wide. Constructed with concrete, it is estimated to weigh more than 20 tons. It was built by members of the UND student chapter of the American Society of Civil Engineers, particularly by junior and senior students in civil engineering.

Dr. Lynne Rocklage reads to five-year-olds during story time at the UND pre-school. Rocklage is the director of the integrated program.

By SUE BERG

Noisy with talk and laughter, 40 pre-school children are keeping several University of North Dakota teachers and trainees busy in a unique academic experience.

These children, ages 2 to 5 years, are enrolled in the community's only integrated pre-school program for children with and without handicaps. Every child is evaluated and receives individually-tailored learning experiences to meet the child's needs.

However, it's not just the children who benefit from the learning experience. Teachers are keeping a watchful eye on the trainees— aspiring professionals who hope someday to have their own handful of pre-schoolers to instruct.

This unique learning and teacher training program is conducted by the UND Center for Teaching and Learning.

"It's the best of all possible experiences," says the program director, Dr. Lynne Rocklage. "Students are working with professionals, and the children are getting the benefit of professional program development and individual attention." Rocklage also is an assistant professor of special education and early childhood education in CTL.

The pre-school recently moved from the third floor of a UND college building to the ground floor of the North Dakota State School for the Blind in a cooperative venture.

The group meets 8:30 to 11:30 a.m. Monday, Wednesday and Friday. Tuition is $30 per semester to cover activity supplies such as paper, paint and glue.

About 60 percent of the enrolled children have handicaps or are at risk. They are referred to Rocklage through area agencies.

"Children who are at risk need educational intervention to prevent the development of a handicapping condition," Rocklage explains. Handicaps include physical disabilities, blind or visually impaired, multiple-handicaps, speech and language impaired, mentally retarded, and social-emotional-behavioral difficulties.

Learning activities feature intervention, prevention and maintenance experiences. Intervention may teach a child to combine two words to express wants and needs, rather than using a single word or gesture. Prevention may teach a child eye-hand coordination using paper, crayons or paint to inhibit the development of later learning problems. Maintenance involves refining the child's existing skills and adding new ones.

For non-handicapped children, they not only have the advantage of individualized instruction, they accept their handicapped peers as equals, Rocklage says. "They do not perceive differences which may lead to fear and prejudice."

About 30 undergraduate and graduate students work in the pre-school program each semester. The students are majoring in early childhood education, special education or communication disorders.

"Cross-training is critical," Rocklage said. "The students need to learn to work as a professional team, representing different disciplines. By training together students get a 'real life' experience in working with professionals from other disciplines."

Brenda Mikkelsen, a native of Hannah, N.D., is a graduate student in special education with an emphasis in pre-school handicapped children.

"I didn't plan to stay on for my master's degree," Mikkelsen says, "but I found I really enjoyed working as an undergrad in an integrated, pre-school program. This is what I'd like to do for a career now."

Children in the integrated program learn how to interact with each other, Mikkelsen says. "There is a whole lot of learning going on, even in playtime. The non-handicapped children learn how to watch out for children who can't move as quickly, for example. Or, if a child in a wheelchair isn't participating at playtime, other children will go up to visit, bringing toys."

The UND program began with federal funding in 1978 for special education graduate training. In the fall of 1986, when the funds ended, there were a dozen children enrolled.

Rocklage, who arrived at UND in the fall of 1986, determined that the program was filling a void in the community and the education system. She decided to revitalize and expand the program.

Rocklage would like to increase the program to five half days each week, and to serve the full range of pre-school children from infancy to age 5.

"The best education program is an integrated program where young children learn and grow together," Rocklage says.

Writers Conference focuses on parent and child

One of the largest crowds in years gathered at opening day of the 1988 Writers Conference. About 800 people were on hand to listen and ask questions as authors Louise Erdrich, Mona Simpson and Michael Dorris talked about parent-child relationships in their writings. Erdrich, a native of North Dakota, is the author of the best selling "Love Medicine" and "Beet Queen." Later in the week, authors Adam Hochschild, Patrick Hemingway and William Snodgrass joined the conference.

Research effort to study land reclamation

The University of North Dakota is among five higher education institutions forming the federally-funded National Mine Land Reclamation Center to coordinate and conduct research into reclamation problems for abandoned and active coal mines.

The center plans to improve scientific methods, equipment and field practices for the cost-effective and environmentally acceptable reclamation of land disturbed by both underground and surface coal mining operations.

The proposal initially asked for funding through the U.S. Bureau of Mines of $3.5 million per year beginning in January. For 1988, $1.2 million was awarded to the center with approximately $300,000 going to the UND Mining and Mineral Resources Research Institute.

Honors Day spotlights academic endeavors

Students, faculty recognized for achievements

Honors Day, recognizing scholarship among students and faculty, was held March 30 at the University of North Dakota in Grand Forks.

Dr. Ken Keller, former president of the University of Minnesota, delivered the keynote address "The Public University: Preserving Tradition Through Change," at the convocation held at 1:30 p.m. in the Chester Fritz Auditorium. Classes were cancelled to allow participation.

Keller, accompanied by UND President Thomas J. Clifford, also attended a special luncheon recognizing about 130 outstanding students.

A highlight of the luncheon was the presentation of the inaugural George and Margaret Starcher Outstanding Undergraduate Thesis Award to Rosanne McBride, a senior in psychology from Grand Forks.

The award, which includes a specially cast bronze medallion and a stipend of $500, was established through an endowment by the Starchers, who are now retired and live in Florida.

Dr. Starcher was president of UND from 1954 to 1971, providing the guidance that took the University to new levels of academic leadership. His wife, Margaret, was especially known for her work in stimulating the fine arts at UND.

Although the thesis is common at the graduate level, few undergraduates choose to undergo the rigorous process of researching and writing the original paper. Ten students competed this year, said Paul Schwartz, director of the UND Honors Program who chaired the awards committee. Schwartz hopes the award will stimulate more interest among undergraduates to write thesis papers.

McBride combines her studies with a full-time job in the UND School of Medicine. Her thesis was titled "Duration Estimation: A Comparison Among Three Methods of Absolute Judgement."

Also during Honors Day, Clifford announced two new Chester Fritz Distinguished Professors, Dr. Richard E. Beringer, professor of history, and Dr. Harvey R. Knoll, professor of biochemistry and molecular biology. Established by the late UND benefactor, Chester Fritz, the professorships provide cash stipends to one or more full-time UND faculty members, who may use the title "Chester Fritz Distinguished Professor" thereafter. First awarded in 1973, this year's stipend is $2,000. With this year's two honorees, 14 professors in all have been given the award.

Beringer is considered a national authority in Civil War history. He is the author of "Historical Analysis: Contemporary Approaches to Clio's Craft," and "Why the South Lost the Civil War," which received numerous favorable reviews. A faculty member in the UND history department since 1970, Beringer received the UND Foundation/Rev. Elmer and Min West Memorial Arts and Sciences Faculty Award in 1987. A meticulous researcher, Beringer also is well-regarded by students as an instructor.

Knoll is recognized as an international authority in enzyme-cytomatrix protein interactions and neurochemistry. He conducts research into the relationship of enzyme activity to the state of association of enzymes with structural elements in the cell. Knoll has received more than $400,000 in research grants since coming to UND in 1980, including the first national research grant from the American Diabetes Association awarded to a scientist in North Dakota. He also has published and presented many papers. In 1986, he received the UND Sigma Xi Faculty Award for Outstanding Scientific Research.

Presidential Scholars: On the go, as in 'goals'

Presidential Freshman Scholars have four-year scholarships supported by the UND Foundation. Among the 64 scholars named last fall are these three, Sandy Ridl of Dickinson, N.D., Mike Culmer of Devils Lake, N.D., and Greg Langan of Valrico, Fla.

By SUE BERG

"Studies come first, sleep comes second."

A trio of freshman students acknowledged this maxim one afternoon while sitting on steps in Merrifield Hall, one of the main classroom buildings on the campus of the University of North Dakota.

These freshman students know what they want, and where they want to go. They take their studies seriously. So does UND.

Greg Langan, Sandy Ridl and Mike Culmer are Presidential Freshman Scholars, a new designation at the University to recognize scholastic achievement. In all, 64 freshman students were accorded the honor last fall. All received significant, four-year scholarships to attend UND, funded through the UND Foundation.

Now into the second semester, Langan, Ridl and Culmer are reaping more honors. They and many of their fellow scholars made the Deans List and were presented D.J. Robertson Awards for straight-A averages. Langan also made the Presidents List.

Grades always have been important, the students said, but studying at UND is different than studying at high school.

"It's scary sometimes," Ridl said. "I spend a lot more time studying now than I ever did. It used to be that I could study the night before a test and do well. Now, I have to plan and study for a week ahead."

Culmer noted that there is more self- (see PRESIDENTIAL, page 7)

China 'doesn't let you go,' UND family learns

Marshalls experience culture mix during 11-month Fulbright stay

By DEBRA ANDERSON

Silk scrolls decorating David Marshall's office walls are reminders of the 11 months he spent as a Fulbright lecturer in China.

Marshall took a leave from his position as associate professor of English at the University of North Dakota for the 1986-87 school year to teach at Nanjing University in Nanjing, Jiangsu.

"It was a wonderful year," Marshall said. "I really enjoyed it. I miss China and the Chinese people."

He taught many of the same courses that he teaches at UND at the advanced master's and doctoral levels at the prestigious "Yale of China."

"Only 2 percent of China's student population goes to 'university' and only 2 percent of those go on to graduate school," he said.

English is the most popular major in China. It allows students to work for the China International Travel Services. CITS is a state-owned agency that controls tourism in China and the travel of Chinese abroad.

An English degree also is valuable to those who work in the import and export business, as well as in China's foreign service.

Marshall and his wife, Ruth, the assistant manager of KFJM radio, studied Chinese for one year before going to China. They hired a tutor for their two sons, who learned "enough to get by."

The Marshalls lived inside the gates of the university. Once outside the gates, they were "in the midst of the hustle and bustle of the city," Ruth said.

"Within one-half mile there were a couple of open-air free markets," she said. "It was always fun to negotiate with the farmers in our kindergarten-level Chinese. There were fish, live chickens and eels swimming in tubs. And vegetables you've never seen in your life.

"At night, people set up little cookers on the street corners and three or four tiny little tables. People would stop by to eat.

"A friend said the Chinese were really the first to sell fast food," Ruth said. "We always ate well.

"You get hooked by the place. Even if there is lots you don't like, it doesn't let you go."

The Marshalls even encountered the Chinese court system. Marshall, his wife and youngest son bought bicycles and were riding them to the Nanjing city park. A little girl ran into the side of the boy's bike.

"We were immediately surrounded by 200 to 300 people all screaming in Chinese," Marshall said. "The parents were screaming at us. The rest of the people were screaming at the parents."

A traffic policeman arrived and took them to a room for a conference. Later the men met in traffic court. Marshall said that Chinese justice is a "no-fault system" and called the judge "a master of negotiations." He said the Chinese judge works to bring about a decision to which all agree.

Because the child had no serious injuries and the parents should have restrained her, the judge did not fault the Marshalls. But he said that perhaps they would like to buy the girl a small gift to create "good Sino-American relations."

Marshall paid the money for the gift and passed out cigarettes to everyone in the courtroom, including two burglary

It's understandable that the Marshall family would resort to the standard "standing wall pose" given the place in this instance—the Great Wall of China, featuring Michael, Ruth, Nathan and David, who is a UND associate professor of English.

Overall, Marshall found the Chinese to be "extremely friendly, scrupulously polite and helpful." Because so many people share so little space, he said "good manners act as the oil or lubrication of society."

"But the Chinese are so diverse that you really can't say 'the Chinese' and put any verb after it. They can't be categorized."

The Chinese, he said, are so radically different from one place to the next that all-encompassing statements are impossible.

"There's an old saying," Marshall said. "If you go to China for a month, you'll write a book. Go for two months, you'll write an article. Go for three months, you'll write nothing."

Seizing opportunities of influence has been key for teaching assistant

By DEBRA ANDERSON

Aaron Schultz likes to give credit where credit is due. But when he names people who are responsible for his success as a student, he neglects to credit one person—himself.

Schultz, who plans to receive a master's degree in vocational education from the University of North Dakota in May 1988, credits numerous professors for providing "the opportunity for me to succeed."

Schultz, however, has created some of his own opportunities. When he was an undergraduate at UND, he saw a need for students to improve their communication skills. This resulted in the formation of the UND chapter of Toastmasters International. Schultz was a charter member and the first president of the group. He is now its adviser.

Schultz graduated from UND in 1985 with a bachelor's degree in marketing education. He now assists Dr. Donald Kohns in teaching marketing education. He also shares Kohns' involvement in the Distributive Education Clubs of America and coordinates competitive events for DECA's yearly secondary and post-secondary career development conferences.

Schultz's campus involvement extends outside of the vocational education department. He played trombone in the University Band, sang in the Varsity Bards, and was a wing representative and a conduct representative at Hancock Hall. He also was a member of College Republicans.

As a freshman and sophomore, Schultz says he tried to join every club he was interested in, but realized that he could only do so many things.

His freshman and sophomore years were spent at North Dakota State University—Bottineau where he graduated with an associate degree in marketing and management.

While at NDSU-Bottineau, he served as the 1982-83 North Dakota DECA president, and was active in drama, pop choir, concert choir and band.

In addition to his campus involvements, Schultz was a member of the North Dakota National Guard for seven years.

Schultz has held a variety of jobs to pay for his education. He has been a cook, truck driver, parts specialist and diesel mechanic. He continues to farm and ranch in Sioux Falls, S.D., with his grandparents in the summer.

Among his academic and leadership awards, Schultz received the O.M. Hager Leadership Award in 1985 and the John C. Peterson Leadership Award in 1987 and 1988.

An accomplished pianist, Schultz has played piano since childhood.

"When I was about five, I crawled up to the piano at a neighbor's house and began playing what I thought sounded like 'In the Mood,'" he said. "I had heard the song on television and was attempting to play it by ear."

Schultz took his first formal music lessons at NDSU-Bottineau and says music instructor Gordon Lindquist was a tremendous influence on him. Schultz enjoys classic ragtime and the swing music of the 1930s and 1940s.

The teacher who had the earliest effect on Schultz was his mother, Janice, who teaches in Crosby. His father, Raymond, is an immigration inspector at the Noonan, N.D., Port of Entry. The family lives in Noonan, N.D.

And just as quickly as Schultz credits others for his success, he praises his parents for the example of civic involvement, personal responsibility and social consciousness they set for him.

"They are involved in community leadership and are very active," he said. "They continue to be a positive influence in my life."

J. Lloyd, Grace Stone Scholarship winner is junior in education

The J. Lloyd and Grace Stone Leadership and Service Award Scholarship was awarded this spring to Ann Poeschel. This scholarship, sponsored by Telesis, is given in honor of the Alumni Association's retired executive director, J. Lloyd Stone, and his wife, Grace. The award recognizes students who have exemplified scholastic achievement, leadership on campus, service to community, and desire to help others.

Poeschel, of Okonomowoc, Wis., is a junior in elementary education and physical education. A member of Gamma Phi Beta sorority, Poeschel served as Panhellenic All-Campus Rush Chairperson. She also has worked extenimposed pressure to do well. "There's a little more expected of you, because you've been singled out as a good student," he said.

Culmer, of Devils Lake, is a pre-med with a possible minor in music. He has played piano for years, and now teaches piano lessons to other UND students. Ridl, of Belfield, N.D., is studying political science with plans to attend law school. Langan, of Valrico, Fla., is majoring in aviation administration with a minor in Spanish.

Langan, Ridl and Culmer said that they almost always had known what they wanted to do. When they were looking for colleges to attend, UND was among those to offer programs that matched their interests.

Langan, whose father is in the Air Force, attended high school a couple of years in Grand Forks. He was aware of UND's aviation program when he began looking for a college to attend.

"But it was the scholarship that made the difference," Langan said. "It pretty much helped me decide to come here."

The Alumni Review had to do some juggling to meet up with these students. The interview was held on a Friday afternoon, and although the trio mentioned a desire for more time to relax, that's hardly what they did after the interview. Langan dashed off to see if language professor Graciela Wilborn was available for a quick practice in Spanish conversation; Ridl headed for the library and Culmer made his way to the Hughes Fine Arts Center to teach piano lessons.

Aaron Schultz, a graduate student in vocational education, teaches a marketing class.

Testamentary giving Within the UND Foundation

Responsible people are aware of the importance of carefully planning the ultimate distribution of their property. Several alumni and friends of the University of North Dakota have found charitable giving to fit well into these plans. Making a gift to the UND Foundation by Will can be a very sensible and beneficial part of estate planning, minimizing tax obligations and protecting as much of an estate as possible for family members and loved ones. Donors can provide thoughtful gifts which will one day further perpetuate their ideals, while helping build a greater University of North Dakota.

Testamentary gifts have benefited the University of North Dakota greatly over the years. Here is sample language for you to consider when using this creative approach to making a gift.

"I give, devise, and bequeath to the University of North Dakota Foundation, a non-profit charitable corporation under the laws of the state of North Dakota,...

(here, a designation can be made such as a percentage of the estate, a designated portion or residue of the estate, a description of real or personal property, or a specific dollar amount)

... for the establishment of...(this section may refer to a Named Endowment, Charitable Remainder Trust arrangement or Charitable Gift Annuity, all of which can be created through a Testamentary provision).

If you would like to discuss the satisfaction of making a Testamentary gift to the UND Foundation, or to inform us you have already done so, please clip and return this coupon. For additional information, please write, or call our office at 1-800-543-8764 (outside North Dakota), or 777-2611 (in North Dakota). All contacts will be confidential.

Four new Foundation named endowments announced

One way to honor and remember loved ones is to establish a named endowment within the University of North Dakota Foundation. The following four endowments all have been recently established within the UND Foundation.

Ronald Allen Kreienkamp, '78, '83, of Grand Forks, has established the Ronald Allen Kreienkamp Scholarship Endowment within the UND Foundation. The income from this endowment will provide an annual scholarship to a deserving student in the Center for Aerospace Sciences program. Kreienkamp has pledged to make a yearly direct gift to fund this scholarship until his death, at which time the endowment will be funded by a testamentary provision in his will.

Kreienkamp has been involved with aviation most of his life, having served nearly eight years in the U.S. Air Force. While working for the Federal Aviation Administration at the Grand Forks Flight Service Station, he attended UND. He received a bachelor's degree in business administration in 1978 and a master's degree in 1983, both from UND. Kreienkamp is a member of the Air Traffic Control Association, Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association, Disabled American Veterans, Civil Air Patrol and MENSA. He is currently working as an air traffic control supervisor with the FAA.

Ralph J. Krogfoss has established the Krogfoss Memorial Scholarship Endowment in memory of his parents, Elmer and Anna Krogfoss, who lived in Binford, N.D., most of their lives. This endowment will provide an annual scholarship to a qualified member of the Binford High School graduating class. Each scholarship is for a four-year term at a rate of $2,000 per year to attend UND.

Ralph Krogfoss graduated from Binford High School in 1940, and received a bachelor's degree in mechanical engineering in 1943. After serving in World War II in the submarine service, he worked for Charles M. Bailey Co. of San Francisco, later becoming the majority stock holder and chief executive officer. Krogfoss sold the company and retired in 1985, but continues to serve on its board of directors. He also serves on the board of Lutheran Care for the Aging in San Francisco and the University of North Dakota Alumni Association and UND Foundation board of directors. Ralph and his wife, Eleanor, make their home in San Mateo, Calif.

The late Donald Milton Bertheuson, '40, established the Donald Milton Bertheuson Endowment within the University of North Dakota Foundation with the proceeds of a $10,000 life insurance policy. Income from this endowment will provide annual scholarship assistance to students who are excelling in accounting and/or management in the UND College of Business and Public Administration.

A native of Wallhalla, N.D., Bertheuson attended the University from 1936 to 1940. He was a member of Delta Sigma Pi, a professional commerce and business administration fraternity. He also was a four-year member of the UND ROTC Band. Bertheuson died in October.

T. Michael Clarke, '70, and key members of his management team of Katun Corp. in Minneapolis, have established the Katun Corporation Scholarship Endowment within the UND Foundation. This endowment will provide scholarships to students in the UND College of Business and Public Administration. The endowment will be funded with additional yearly contributions to provide a minimum of $2,000 annually for scholarships until the interest from the endowment can support this level of scholarship assistance.

Clarke, the founder, president and chief executive officer of Katun, brought a number of his classmates and associates from UND into his fledgling organization. This included Gordon A. Johnson, '68, '87; Gerald Gullikson, '68; Larry J. Stroup, '71, who serves as executive vice president and chief operating officer; Glenn W. Spitzer, '70, vice president of corporate operations/administration; and Alin Sausker Hoffart, '73, who is in charge of personnel administration.

Katun Corp. is the largest distributor of office automation replacement parts and supplies in the world.

As athletic rep, Schubert helps guide UND through hoopla of sports action

Complexities of intercollegiate scene demand determination, diligence, data

By DAVE VORLAND

Hoopla that rivals Barnum and Bailey. Post season-playoff berths worth five and six figure sums. Coaches fired for losing seasons. Under the table payoffs. Law suits. Misuse of drugs. College athletes who later admit they can't read.

Anyone who watches the headlines knows that intercollegiate athletics no longer is the simple providing of opportunities for young people to compete athletically against other young people.

Even at Division II schools such as the University of North Dakota, athletic programs have gone "big time," much to the excitement of a public with an insatiable appetite for sports.

But along with the glamour has come controversy and occasional scandal, sometimes induced by the need to raise and spend big dollars. Increasingly, questions are being asked about the proper role of academics in college sports, especially in the recruitment and treatment of student-athletes.

Helping UND find its way through a mine field of rapidly evolving legal and ethical issues is George Schubert, its long time institutional representative to the National Collegiate Athletic Association.

In this job, Schubert speaks for the University's total academic enterprise. He also represents UND on the policy-making bodies of the North Central Intercollegiate Athletic Conference and the Western Collegiate Hockey Association.

In doing so, Schubert, who became dean of the University College in 1978 after 13 years as a UND professor of communication disorders, has become one of the nation's authorities on sports law, ethics, and academics.

He also has earned a reputation for emphasizing the "student" factor of the "student-athlete" equation. His views have occasionally put him at odds with powerful figures in the NCAA, not to mention at some of the schools with which UND competes.

For example, Schubert has been in the middle of the debate over the NCAA's so-called "Proposition 48" regulating the eligibility of freshmen, and the related question of whether the rule—initially enacted three years ago for Division I—should be applied to smaller universities and colleges.

Thanks to Schubert and like-minded institutional representatives, Proposition 48, now known as "5-1-(j)" in the sometimes bewildering manual of NCAA policies, will go into effect this fall at Division II schools such as UND.

To compete in their first year, freshmen must have scored at least a 14 composite score on the ACT examination and have completed a mandated "core" curriculum of courses in high school. Otherwise they must defer athletic participation for a year while devoting full attention to their studies.

The average ACT score of UND's entering class is about 18, Schubert says, noting that none of last year's freshman student-athletes would have had to sit out.

The rule is now well accepted at the Division I level, Schubert says, with many coaches changing their minds on the issue. However, the "big schools" are dragging their feet on another rule that will go into effect this fall at Division II schools.

That is "Amendment No. 39," a satisfactory progress rule that requires a progressive minimum grade-point average for student-athletes following each season of competition (1.6 after the first season, 1.8 after the second season, and 2.0 after the third, with 4.0 being straight A).

In a letter to "The NCAA News" taking the large schools to task, Schubert wrote: "This action or lack of action provides ammunition to the theory that Division I is more concerned with making money than with the academic progress and graduation rates of student-athletes. Hopefully, this lack of commitment to higher academic standards will only be a temporary delay in the approval of academic progress regulations. It is important that what is being called the 'academic reform' movement continue at a steady pace."

Earlier, Schubert caught the attention of NCAA power brokers by proposing that team academic performance be included in the formula that pays schools for participation in NCAA post-season tournaments.

"I have a folder full of supportive letters," he says with a laugh, "but I suspect most of the delegates hope this idea goes away."

But Schubert's growing visibility on the national intercollegiate athletic scene has less to do with floating startling ideas at NCAA meetings than with the scholarly approach he has taken with respect to the serious issues.

For instance, he is the co-author of a text, "Sports Law," widely used in law schools across the country and updated last year.

He also is the author of several papers and articles on such topics as academic advisement of athletes, evaluation and intervention programs for high-risk, underprepared student-athletes, ethical treatment of athletes, recruiting reform, legal issues, and, of course, NCAA regulations.

He also speaks widely on these topics. In April, for instance, he presented a program in Massachusetts entitled "The Triad of: Property Interest, Due Process and Unions as it relates to amateur Collegiate Athletics."

Joining him on the platform at Springfield College was his lawyer daughter, Cheryl Lynn Schubert-Madsen, of Grand Forks. Schubert's wife, Arline, who holds a 1982 UND law degree, also is a frequent co-author and presenter.

Schubert is active in the athletic conferences. He was a member of the NCAA committee to study the length of athletic seasons, number of contests and size of squads, and has served as president of the NCIAC and WCHA.

Another factor giving Schubert credibility is his own background in sports. He was an all-around athlete at Scandinavia (Wis.) High School and played two years of varsity basketball at the University of Wisconsin-La Crosse. He remains an avid handball player.

But to Schubert and to the University of North Dakota, winning isn't everything. "The integrity of the institution is at stake," he asserts.

1987-1988 SUSTAINING FUND GOALS

As of Apr. 15, the UND Annual Sustaining Fund Drive had received $809,697. Annual Drive and Major Contributions now total $4,184,671 from 4,763 contributors.

A Standing O for Dr. J

Dr. LaVernia Jorgensen, longtime statistician for the women's basketball team, receives congratulations from Tom Tschider, athletics marketing director, and a standing ovation from the crowd at the North Dakota State University game Feb. 21, for her years of service. Dr. J., as many students know her, is retiring after 25 years of teaching in health, physical education and recreation. She plans to spend retirement "counting money," she says, joking. Jorgensen is a numismatist, a collector of coins and currency. She also collects stamps.
