U Coed Relates Denmark Experiences

EDITOR'S NOTE — Dianne Pearson of Chisholm, Minn., a UND senior, is a college ambassador to Denmark under the Experiment in International Living. She was among six local students, four from the University and two from Grand Forks high schools, chosen as 1969 Experiment in International Living participants to travel to other countries this summer. Miss Pearson is the daughter of Mrs. Fran Pearson, and tells of her experiences in a letter dated July 7.

Denmark is a country which communicates something special to each person. Too many people have time only to visit Copenhagen and its Tivoli Gardens.

Although one shouldn't miss this European Disneyland with fairy tale charm, unfortunately in the process, many American tourists miss the real Denmark. I believe a country is people, and I am thankful to the Experiment for giving me this summer of opportunity to know the Danish people.

I would now like to invite each of you to Aalborg, my home city in Denmark. This modern Danish democratic township is situated in the geographical center of Scandinavia; consequently, Aalborg is an old shipping town with shipbuilding traditions. Aalborg Shipyard Ltd., employing 2,700 men, is the biggest enterprise in North Jutland and one of the biggest in the country.

The remaining 22,300 Aalborg residents are either owners of large, modern dairy farms or work in the many smaller industries.

During the last seven years Aalborg, as well as the rest of Denmark, has gone through a rapid development towards further industrialization.

This development is characterized by an enormous expansion in the number of factories and also by the foundation of new institutes of learning and such institutions which in a modern community are necessary when the population of a country moves from a rural to an urban society.

Urban authorities have tried to answer the demands of development by participation in town and regional planning.

Each year Aalborg invests large sums in building roads, sewers and public services, hospitals, schools and other social institutions.

Denmark is known as a country which takes care of its elderly and its unwed mothers—Aalborg is typical of the Danish welfare state in this respect, and yet has been able to keep its rates and taxes at a reasonable level. The main reason for this is that its citizens have received salary increases sufficient to cover the rising costs of government without the need for a tax percentage hike.

Not only is it economical to live in Aalborg, I discovered quickly it's also a lot of fun. There is much evidence to the fact that Aalborg, like most Danish cities, is a perfect place for fun-loving people.

Flowers are growing wild everywhere, including the town square—closed off for pedestrians only.

Red thatched roofs and cobblestone pavement are part of the historical style which often contrasts pleasantly with contemporary buildings of glass and steel. Nearly every house is a focal point of architectural interest, but feet grow easily tired of exploring the exciting Danish design.

If you're a lover of theatre, you may relax in the Aalborg Theatre, one of the most publicized and successful theatres in Denmark. It has become the stage on which the plays of Berthold Brecht are played most frequently.

If your interest is music, the symphony orchestra is an important factor in Aalborg, playing to audiences upwards of 1,000 and quite often heard on radio.

The town museum comprises both an art section and a historical one, which illustrates further the dominance of the arts in a Dane's life.

Another major part of Danish life is food and drink. The words Beer and akvavit (snaps) come as part as the words horse and carriage. Combined with yet another Danish specialty, the smørbrød (an open sandwich), they make a strong team.

Beer is the Danish national drink, and a considerable part of the amount consumed in Denmark is brewed in Aalborg. Its brewery Aktie Bryggerier, produces no less than 11 types of beer. One of more interesting days was spent touring this brewery and testing each of those 11 beers.

It is a bit much, of course, to ask people to come to Denmark expressly for the purpose of drinking beer, but once you are here, I recommend at least once to buy one of those cool, blonde beers.

Danish cuisine is usually based on bread and butter rather than the more sophisticated dishes. It has not got the French or Italian lightness, charm and elegance, but Danish dishes are well prepared and tasty.

Generally speaking, Danes treat alcohol and food the way they should be treated—with enjoyment, but a certain care.

There are 168 restaurants of widely different types in Aalborg. I have enjoyed meals at only two of them. The reason would be obvious if you tasted my Danish mother's cooking.

I would now like to invite you to my Danish home in Hasereis, a suburb of Aalborg known as the old town. The houses here are similar to my Danish family's home—a quaint building of Danish simplicity and charm.

I have two Danish sisters now. My younger sister, Kirsten, 14, has time only for the horses. She is either riding, brushing, feeding or sleeping with them. Kirsten does spend some time with her new American sister—teaching her to ride.

My other Danish sister, Bente, and I spend more time together. Because of my relationship with her, I have discovered that the young people are essentially the same everywhere.

My sister and I share common interests in the English language, books, clothes, records and, of course, boys.

A favorite Danish pastime is an evening of conversation over beer, with music—usually American—playing in the background. Religion, government, attitudes toward sex, the Vietnam war, Biafra and taxes are only a few of the subjects we have discussed.

I have also discussed the Danish military with my brother, Joren, 18. He has been in the Danish Air Force for one year and has four years remaining. Although he volunteered, there is a military draft in Denmark, but men are required to serve their country for only 12-16 months, depending on the military branch. As Denmark is a small country and a great advocate of peace, most men don't mind the service.

Joren has been home on holiday these past 10 days and is usually my swimming buddy.

We bicycle to the sea nearly every day and I'm crazy about the cold salt water.

I also enjoy bicycling everywhere. Occasionally mor and far (mother and father) join us. Far has the typical Danish humor, and when we're together I'm usually laughing.

He is also my interpreter as mor knows only a little English, and yet mor and I communicate with a language more meaningful than words.

Hans Christian Anderson was originally responsible for the make believe image of Denmark. Today the Danes themselves contribute to the magic and mystery which surround the country.

A Danish friend told me, however, that the "fair tale country" is not the real Denmark. My obvious question was "What then is the real Denmark?"

He couldn't tell me. Tomorrow he, 10 other Danes and myself are beginning a 10-day trip across the country and I will try to find the answer.

MISS DIANNE PEARSON

An Experience in Understanding

By DOROTHY TORBLAA

Into a large and modern auditorium before a colorful, uninhibited audience to the sound of the brassy improvised rock of the "Soul Brothers," Richard calmly led me, a hesitant North Dakota student, in a new dance.

Under the bright lights I moved self-consciously. Gradually, with Richard's reassurance, I, too, was "boycoring."

This is an example of a success in attempting to participate in my new cultural situation. Upon first arriving in Grambling we, the exchange students, were welcomed by instructors and administrators. As the exchange program had not been publicized, most of the Grambling students were surprised by our presence. Nevertheless they were overwhelmingly interested and hospitable.

Soon I was learning the Grambling slang; I wore more colorful clothing, bell-bottoms, and neck scarves; I learned a little about the slave trade, slave revolts, slavery, the role of black men in the civil war and in Reconstruction, segregation, desegregation, integration, civil rights and Black Power.

I listened to tapes of African drums talking proverbs. During a telelecture Ralph Ellefson talked about Invisible Man. I learned to dig "Soul music;" some of the artists include Aretha Franklin, Percy Sledge, Booker T. and the M. G.'s, Sam and Dave. I learned to dance "soulfully." I ate lots of greens, grits, chicken, and rice.

Confusingly though, much of the initial friendliness withered away. After a couple of weeks many of the seemingly friendly glances and greetings turned to cold stares and hisses.

During one of our coffee conversations Donnie explained that he and many of the Grambling students were not brought up in a "friendly white society." He was brought up in a black neighborhood.

His friends were black. His indirect knowledge of "whiteness" tended to be as prejudiced as much of our indirect knowledge of the black man. His limited direct contact with "whiteness" was negative.

Slender, serious Allene explained that her skepticism about white people derives mostly from the time her father was coerced by the local klan into refusing an employment promotion.

The friendships formed at Grambling were especially meaningful because they were challenged by both white and black society. Living in a black community and college we felt most potentially the challenge of the black people. Some students equated Black Pride with black superiority. Within the syntax of their language my black friends were called "Uncle Toms;" they received as many stares, insults, and questions as I did.

This pressure many times tested and strengthened our friendships; at times it also threatened our relationships. The stares and the rumors sometimes interfered with our simple desire to relax and be friends.

The scorn and prejudice, although disconcerting, were also enlightening. I learned what it feels like to be in a minority position. This time I was the "inferior," the "white devil." The stares and prejudice that I received did not startle me.

I realized that they were a historical reaction and a racial-psychological reaction to the dominating and often times cruel white society.

But I remain somewhat perplexed by my own psychological reaction. I became somewhat paranoid. I withdrew temporarily, sometimes for 10 minutes, other times for 2 days. A defensive attitude prepared and protected me in my anticipation for the next insult.

I walked by people refusing to acknowledge them; I brooded in my room; I became sullen even around genuinely concerned, helpful people. This reaction puzzles me. How much more embittered are people who have been discriminated against throughout their lives?

GRAMBLING-UND exchange student Dorothy Torblaa dons her Grambling-style outfit as she relates her experiences in the predominantly black school.
