WHAT WAR MEANS TO THE BAR

There is no group of men and women in America cherishing a deeper love of country or more sincere devotion to its institutions than the members of the legal profession.

In impressive numbers they have gone to the colors already, many at the sacrifice of an established clientele, all at the sacrifice of priceless time in the years when a clientele is built. It has been estimated that half of the lawyers in the United States have participated in the work of the draft. Thousands more have served their country in other capacities. This is in the tradition of the profession.

The declaration of war will, of course, mean a sharp increase in the number of lawyers engaged in some activity pertinent to the prosecution of the war.

It must never be forgotten, however, that there is a home front where the Bar can render an unspectacular but vitally important service to its country. So vital, indeed, is this service that failure to undertake and perform it may mean the blood, sweat and tears of our people will be found in the end to have been spent in vain.

The service referred to is that of preserving against the shocks and dislocations inevitable in time of war all the essential elements and materials of our democracy and not only guarding our institutions while men are fighting for them but perfecting them for the peacetime use of a victorious America.

This means that the Bar must pursue with redoubled energy the program already undertaken, for in the accomplishment of that program, embracing as it does such projects as modernizing
